Assessing and Addressing Litter in Durham's Waterways

by

Nancy Lauer, Ph.D.

The Duke University Environmental Law and Policy Clinic, in collaboration with local nonprofits and the City of Durham, develops local, data-driven strategies to reduce plastic pollution. This talk will highlight our recent work with the North Carolina Riverkeepers to characterize and quantify litter loadings in streams across the state using trash traps. It will also discuss our work to implement upstream solutions to reduce plastic usage as well as downstream solutions to remove plastic pollution from our waterways.

Nancy Lauer is a lecturing fellow and staff scientist with the Duke Environmental Law and Policy Clinic. Since joining Duke Law in 2018, Dr. Lauer has worked on a wide range of environmental policy matters including drinking water quality, children's exposure to toxic chemicals, hazardous waste remediation, and single-use plastics. Recently, she has worked with non-profits, Riverkeepers, and the City of Durham on measures to reduce plastic pollution through stormwater controls and reduction policies. Dr. Lauer received her PhD in Earth and Ocean Sciences from the Duke Nicholas School of the Environment and her Bachelor of Science in Geology from the College of William and Mary.
